THANK from YOU FSNS

FSNS would like to express our thanks to everyone who helped to make our Food Safety Conference and Amarillo Lab Grand Opening a success. A great time was had by all, and we look forward to seeing you at the next event!

A Holistic View of the Introduction of Foodborne Pathogens into the Food Production Chain

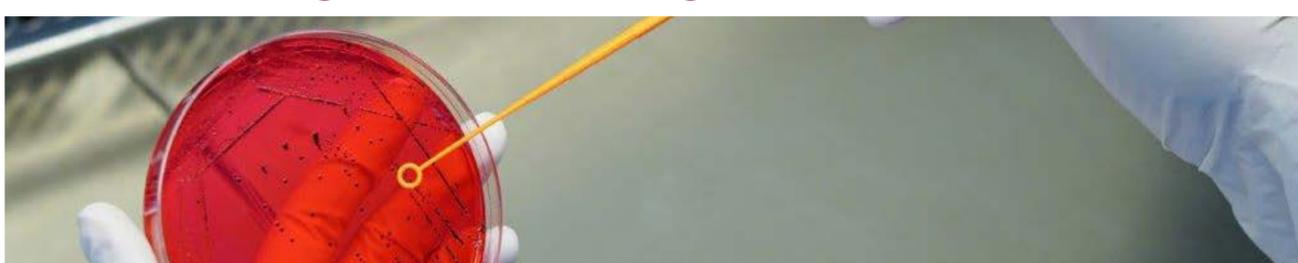

With the emergence of foodborne illness outbreaks that involve food product types that have not been traditionally associated with the specific foodborne pathogen causing the outbreak, taking essential steps to halt and prevent future outbreaks will help protect public health, and educate those involved in the production chain about best practices.

My Recall, Your Recall and Vendor Suitability

Most processors of RTE or NRTE products have a common point of risk that need to be managed with constant vigilance: when another producer's recall becomes your recall. Learn more about how these events serve as a wakeup call to all producers and suppliers and how being proactive with the right knowledge, programs, procedures and records is key to minimizing risk.

Logical Approaches for Tracking and Controlling Persistent Foodborne Pathogens in the Processing Plant Environment

See how combined microbiological testing, whole genome sequencing and mathematical modeling can be used effectively as a risk-based approach to controlling foodborne pathogen persistence.

Who Is Taking On Food Fraud?

Food fraud in the U.S. is gaining momentum. What is being done to minimize exposure to risk from intentional fraud and potential adulteration? Learn about the individual efforts of seven organizations engaged in fighting food fraud and see what they are doing to set standards of quality, improve control and testing of products, and mitigate fraud.
